Montessori still a strong alternative

A century-old philosophy of learning remains relevant, popular with parents and educators

By JACQUELYN BENGFORT
Special to The Daily Record

“Montessori.” The word alone can conjure images of overanxious parents jostling to get their 3-year-old into an expensive, exclusive preschool in order to ensure the child’s future success.

Yet, the hype often obscures what Maryland educators and parents continue to find: A Montessori education, with its emphasis on engaging children by tapping into their innate curiosity, remains a powerful method for developing students who can think deeply and independently.

Features of Montessori

An educational philosophy developed by Dr. Maria Montessori at the turn of the last century, the Montessori method incorporates a number of unique features.

One of those is the mixed-age classroom, in which children spanning two or more commonly three grades are grouped together. Lainie Santos Torres, curriculum coordinator at Love of Learning Montessori School in Columbia, said that while they’re sometimes misunderstood as children teaching children, in practice mixed-age classrooms are effective because they allow children to not only solidify their learning by sharing it with other students, but also to gain exposure to the concept of mentoring.

“If you look at a lot of the big-name companies of today ... they’re using a lot of [mentorship] models,” Torres said. “To have children do it is really just modeling real life.”

Another feature of Montessori schools is the specially prepared environment. Each classroom is filled with sensory objects that aid in learning, and students make choices regarding both what they want to work with and for how long, said Tamara Sheesley Balis, head of the Montessori School in Lutherville.

“Our children have three hours to go into the depths of their explorations and discoveries,” she said.

The uninterrupted work time allows children to build self-esteem by allowing for challenges, Balis said. “We want them to learn to persevere and to keep working, even if it’s hard.”

And teachers are trained not to intervene when a student is deeply involved in an activity.

Above all, the Montessori method places the child, rather than the instructor, at the center of the learning process. While the teacher ensures each student receives education in all required subjects, “the student provides the inspiration and excitement,” Elizabeth Whitaker, administrative director of the Montessori International Children’s House in Annapolis, wrote in an email. Teachers act as guides, rather than sources of knowledge, as is the case in a traditional school setting.

Montessori proponents are confident in the wide applicability of the method. “Most children are Montessori children,” Balis said.

MONTESSORI INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S HOUSE

Students at the Montessori International Children’s House in Annapolis provide the inspiration for their instruction, Administrative Director Elizabeth Whitaker says. Teachers there act as guides, rather than sources of knowledge.

Family matters

For many Maryland Montessori schools, the admissions process begins when the parent of a prospective student visits the school and observes a classroom. While the child also will be evaluated for fit with the school, generally through a visit and possibly an interview, parents must “have faith in the methodology,” Torres said. The first step is seeing the methodology in action.

That belief in the method is important because the school and the family will work together in a child’s education. Love of Learning looks for families who will “help facilitate their children’s natural development, within the classroom and at home,” Torres said.

In return, families benefit from schools that work to support them. Many Montessori programs offer before- or after-school care that are a boon to working parents whose schedules don’t conform to the average school day.

Families also can tap into what their children are learning and bring lessons into the household.

“We develop a very close working partnership with the family,” said An-

Art education at St. Timothy's School in Stevenson includes cultural research, art history and an emphasis on individualized approaches to studio work. Past student artwork is shown above, from traditional visual arts courses to fashion design and pottery. Photography, digital media and dance and theater courses also are offered.

There's still a place for art in STEM

The push is on for science and math, but arts education remains important

By GINA GALLUCCI-WHITE
Special to The Daily Record

Key School dance teacher Jayne Karsten was performing an online search when she came across a former student's blog.

The student recalled when Karsten showed her class how writing is like a dance: After taking a few steps, she let the class imagine how they would finish the piece.

"Ms. Karsten taught me about an interconnectedness of skills and organization," the former student wrote.

Karsten was startled her lecture had resonated so well that the student had remembered the analogy for decades. She was not surprised, however, by the ways in which arts education has an extraordinary impact on students' lives.

"The arts open up understanding of just about everything," she said. They "can be the key to opening up a whole new understanding with kids."

The Key School, which offers arts programs from pre-K through 12th grade, is nationally recognized for its Orff Schwerk music program. Students in the early to middle section learn daily about various aspects of musical education, including speech, rhythm and creative movement.

"It really is a wonderful program," she said. "The Orff program encourages imagination and taps, early on, different things within students that they maybe didn't even know they had."

Visual arts including photography, drawing, ceramics, theater, voice and instruments also are part of the high school curricula.

Ancillary benefits abound

The arts "help create a vibrancy in the school," she said. "It encourages imagination and confidence building.”

Throughout her 25 years at the Annapolis-based school, Karsten said, she has heard students discuss how much the arts programs helped them in other subjects as well. She sees the arts as a gateway into multiple areas of study. A minuet can teach a student about math, for instance, while a painting can be instructional in geometric patterns.

"The arts can be used to clarify and reinforce the philosophies of a given time period," she said.

Matt Micciche, head of Friends School of Baltimore, pointed to studies showing how the arts help to shape ways of thinking in students and assist them in other academic areas. The arts can enhance critical thinking skills, produce the ability to replicate other works and open students' eyes to and appreciation for multiple subject areas.

"The arts are one more venue where students can find their passion or find their talent," Micciche said.

The arts' creativity can also give students a sense of empowerment, he said, and reinforce feelings of purpose and accomplishment.

Micciche said he often sees students who are talented in the arts also perform well in their other classes.

"It gives them a reason to be excited to get to school," he said.

Historical appreciation

Authorized to grant international baccalaureate degrees, the all-girls St. Timothy's School in Stevenson incorporates art instruction through cultural research, helping students to gain knowledge of historical art periods or movements, and an individualized approach to studio projects. Traditional visual arts courses are offered, including photography and digital media along with dance and theater.

"Students become better, creative problem solvers in all walks of life," said Leslie Lichtenberg, St. Timothy's director of communications and public relations. "The arts allow students to access their right brain and create an outward expression of self. Theater, specifically, trains students to learn how to be comfortable, be vulnerable and expressive in front of an audience."

The Friends School offers fine and performing arts programs beginning in pre-kindergarten all the way up to 12th grade.

"That's how important we think it [the arts] is," Micciche said.

In recent years, as schools nationwide have re-emphasized science, technology, engineering and math, or STEM, education, visual and performing arts programs in many cases are the first to be cut or receive reduced funding.

Karsten said such thinking is short-sighted. Some policymakers have a blind spot for the arts and believe it is separate from other areas of learning such as history, language and science.

The Key School makes art an intrinsic part of all disciplines, Karsten said. A student may hate history, but if a teacher comes at the subject a different way — through paintings or dance — the student will eventually learn to understand more and do better in his or her studies.

Micciche said he is seeing more policy papers encouraging educators to rethink the importance of arts education through STEAM, or science, technology, engineering, arts and math.

The Friends School hosts an art show each spring, for which each student has the opportunity to put one or two pieces on public display.

"The pride that they get from having their work displayed is really powerful," Micciche said. "It reminds them to keep at it and deepens their engagement in art."

About our schools guide

The following pages list independent primary and secondary schools in the state of Maryland, including both secular and religious schools that are not part of the state's public school systems. The list is based on information provided by the website of the Maryland State Department of Education (MSDE) and by the schools themselves. In many cases we talked to school representatives; in some cases we relied on school websites.

Tuition figures are the latest available. Many schools had not set fees for 2012-2013 when we gathered this information, and schools often charge extra fees that are not considered part of tuition. We recommend that readers contact schools directly to check on tuition and to ask about additional fees, enrollment policies and waiting lists.

Readers also should be aware that just because the state licenses a school to teach certain grades, that does not mean all of those grades are offered.

It is important to us (and to our readers) to keep the information in this semi-annual guide as accurate as possible. Please bring any discrepancies to our attention by emailing the special publications editor at Tara.Buck@TheDailyRecord.com.

Montessori >> State to begin validating alternative program drew Kutt, founder and head of the Oneness-Family School, a Montessori curriculum school in Chevy Chase. Kutt said that lessons in such topics as conflict resolution, acknowledgment of others and balancing technology with other activities can be practiced at home.

By any other name

As the Montessori method grew to attain its current level of worldwide popularity, it in some ways fell victim to its own success. Torres said that because the methodology is not patented, until very recently anyone could open a so-called "Montessori" school or daycare, regardless of his or her credentials, training or knowledge of the learning materials.

In Maryland, however, the state Department of Education has put in place new requirements to ensure the quality of Montessori schools throughout the region. By July 1, 2015, all schools claiming the term "Montessori" must be validated by a state-approved validating organization. According to the department's website, schools will be evaluated on "teacher qualifications, written curriculum, instructional methods and materials."

Even with such a process in place, variation will occur. Balis said Dr. Montessori had not fully developed her infant, middle school and high school curricula at the time of her death in 1952, so those areas continue to mature.

The nature of a method that respects children as individuals with their own ways of learning means that each child's experience will be distinctive. Ultimately, parents must take the time to evaluate the course offerings of individual schools and make the decision to enroll based on their confidence in the school and their own understanding of their child. Nothing can replace a school visit, especially given the longstanding misconceptions about Montessori education.

"Once the misconceptions are addressed, most people are actually inspired by what Montessori offers to the child and the family," Balis said.

Alternatives

If Montessori is not for your family, Maryland is rich in educational philosophies to choose from. While the specific schools named may not be best for a child when it comes to location, these educational philosophies are available in many schools throughout the state, including the greater Baltimore region.

Progressive education

Green Acres School in North Bethesda offers a curriculum based on the research of reformers such as John Dewey at the University of Chicago and the Swiss developmental psychologist Jean Piaget. The hallmarks of the philosophy, according to lower school head Julie Gill, are a belief in the power of authentic learning and an experiential, hands-on approach.

ONENESS-FAMILY SCHOOL

Andrew Kutt, founder and head of the Oneness-Family School in Chevy Chase, says lessons in topics including conflict resolution can be taught and reinforced by students' families at home.

"We're very much an outdoors school," she said. "A lot of our learning takes place outside and connects with classroom learning."

Sudbury model education

Mark McCaig, a founder and staff member at the Fairhaven School in Upper Marlboro, names three features that distinguish his school: complete intellectual freedom, democratic governance and age-mixing. All students, ages 5 through 19, learn through interaction in a "real-time democracy," he said, rather than through a set curriculum. Modeled on the Sudbury Valley School, established in Massachusetts in 1968, another feature of Fairhaven is the judicial committee, which handles all alleged infractions of school rules and on which all students serve in turn.

Waldorf school education

The first Waldorf School was established in Stuttgart, Germany, in 1919; the method made its way to New York City in 1928. At the Washington Waldorf School in Bethesda, children's essays and illustrations become their own personalized textbooks, class teacher Jack Petrash said. Other attributes of a Waldorf education include a teacher who stays with the same group of students from first through eighth grade, block lessons in which the first two hours of the day are devoted to in-depth study of a single topic for three to four weeks at a time and a pre-kindergarten/kindergarten curriculum given over in large part to imaginative play.

Arts-integrated education

At the Lucy School in Middletown, the arts are "integral to students' entire academic and creative evolution," founding director Victoria Brown wrote in an email. The school's multi-sensory approach combines project-based learning, improvisational drama, and the aesthetics of nature to actively involve children in their own education, and is effective for a wide range of learning styles.

CAPTURING the Hearts & Minds of CHILDREN

OPEN HOUSE: Wed, Nov. 7, 9-11 am

A classical, Christ-centered, co-educational community of learners, existing to educate the hearts and minds of K-8 children through hands-on learning and meaningful experiences. Our integral approach ties all the subjects together through common themes, forming strong connections and deep roots in the minds of our students. Cambridge students graduate with a firm foundation of character, skills, and knowledge and are well-equipped to proceed to high school and beyond.

PEABODY PREPARATORY FALL 2012

The Peabody Preparatory's fall semester of music and dance instruction for all ages begins September 5.

Early childhood classes, dance classes, and individual instruction in all orchestral instruments, guitar, harp, voice, and piano are offered at the Preparatory's main campus in Baltimore's historic Mount Vernon and at the Towson campus on Dulaney Valley Road, where Children's Chorus is also available.

Early childhood classes and individual instruction in flute, guitar, harp, voice, and piano are offered at the Annapolis campus at Maryland Hall for the Creative Arts. Individual music instruction and Children's Chorus are also offered at Howard County locations.

GATEWAY SCHOOL

If communication difficulties are a child's primary barrier to success in other areas, Gateway School is an excellent place for him or her to grow.

LITTLE EARS, BIG VOICES

A unique integration of audiology, speech-language therapy and special education.

SPEECH-LANGUAGE THERAPY

Early intervention is the best way to ensure that a child with communication needs is prepared for school.
