Men: We have trouble picking out an outfit

BY PERRY BEEMAN

The folks at Perry Ellis — who are bringing you a virtual personal stylist powered by Amazon Alexa — thought they'd check up on men's dressing habits. Fast Company reports.

http://bit.ly/2fDBBC8

The main findings after interviewing 1,000 men ages 18 to 54: They are close to clueless at knowing what to wear. And they admit it:

- 81 percent said they have trouble dressing for an occasion.
- 73 percent say they've arrived somewhere feeling inappropriately dressed.
- 33 percent skipped an event after second-guessing an outfit.
- 48 percent didn't know what to wear to a funeral.
- 38 percent weren't sure how to dress for jury duty.

We're still pretty civil in Greater Des Moines, survey shows

BY JOE GARDYASZ

Greater Des Moines residents give their colleagues high marks for integrity, but a majority say their co-workers aren't handling workplace stress well, according to results of the recently completed communitywide Human Capital Survey. And in a national environment of deteriorating civility, Central Iowans have something to (respectfully) brag about.

Scott Raecker, executive director of the Robert D. and Billie Ray Center at Drake University, provided a sneak peek at the data recently during a Greater Des Moines Partnership workplace well-being event.

The Human Capital Survey, organized by the Partnership, the Ray Center and the Institute for Excellence and Ethics, aims to help business leaders improve talent attraction and retention by examining how connected Central Iowa residents are to their coworkers, neighbors and the community as a whole.

Community members rate Greater Des Moines highly for safety and community pride, Raecker noted. Ninety-one percent agreed with the statement that they're "living a healthy and productive life within their community," and 90 percent agreed that their community is a good place to raise a family.

And 87 percent agreed that "individuals in my workplace act with integrity," a figure that Greater Des Moines should use as a selling point, Raecker said.

"I travel around the country and work a lot with this integrity issue, and there's just nobody else we're seeing with such strong numbers on a communitywide basis, so that's part of the story line we should be talking about," he said.

The survey also points to areas that need to be addressed. Regarding workplace stress, for instance, 57 percent of respondents said they think their colleagues "fail to identify and manage stress well."

There have also been noticeable changes in feelings about safety and civility, Raecker observed.

The percentage of Central lowans who believe their community is safe — 85 percent — is down 7 points from the survey conducted two years ago. And 80 percent said they feel they're treated with civility and respect, a "very high" figure in comparison with the rest of the country, even though it's a 10-point slip from two years ago, Raecker said.

Coming soon: 10 millionth guest

BY SUZANNE BEHNKE

The staff at Des Moines Performing Arts busied themselves recently, figuring out that the upcoming show "Something Rotten!" will bring the 10 millionth guest to a DMPA show. They used numbers going back to 1979 when the Civic Center opened. "Rotten" is part of the Willis Broadway Series, which over the years has brought 3,940,301 guests. It turns out show business is big business. The series brings in $30 million in regional economic development annually, DMPA's Jonathan Brendemuehl says.

Korean farmers check out Iowa

BY PERRY BEEMAN

Occasionally, foreign visitors come through to see Iowa agriculture in detail. The visits don't make the same kind of headlines a visit by, say, the head of the Soviet Union during Cold War would bring, but they are significant nevertheless. (Nikita Khrushchev visited Iowa in 1959.)

A U.S. Grains Council trade team of South Korean grain buyers, researchers, scientists, customers and government officials visited Iowa to learn about the ethanol industry in late September. They visited the Iowa Corn office, a couple of livestock and grain farms, and a couple of ethanol plants, eating rib-eye sandwiches for lunch. They met with representatives of Kum & Go and the American Lung Association.

They commented about the size of American farm machinery, Iowa Corn said in a release. Farms in South Korea are 1 acre, and farming is labor-intensive there. South Korea is the third-largest importer of U.S. corn and of a byproduct of ethanol production that is used as livestock feed. South Korea also buys millions of gallons of ethanol.

Most Iowa corn goes to ethanol plants or feed

BY PERRY BEEMAN

It's still a battle to get our coastal friends to realize most of what we see in cornfields is not destined for dinner plates. We call it field corn, and it could be headed to fuel pumps, animal feed or a can of soda. The Iowa Corn Growers Association gave us a breakdown for how field corn was split up in 2016-17:

- Fuel: 39 percent
- Food/industrial uses: 11 percent
- Feed: 26 percent
- Exports: 17 percent
- Other: 7 percent

Swift mentoring at TrueNorth

BY JOE GARDYASZ

When retired insurance executive Jim Swift isn't wintering down in Naples, Fla., you might find him at TrueNorth's West Des Moines office, where he mentors a young professional who's transitioning into the insurance business.

Swift had held president, CEO and chairman roles with Holmes Murphy & Associates before retiring from the company in early 2015 as part of a planned leadership succession program.

"I really had not planned on getting back into the business," said Swift, who had a two-year noncompete agreement that ended earlier this year. Since June, he's been working as a non-employee adviser to Lane Danielsen, a former ISU football wide receiver who had been selling medical equipment and wanted to get into

"He's helping TrueNorth establish their property/ casualty presence in Central Iowa," Swift said. "TrueNorth has done a good job of pairing him up with some experienced people to learn the business, so that's been very helpful to him."

Speaking of P/C insurance, Swift said he was relieved to hear there wasn't significant damage in his area of Naples from Hurricane Irma.

A CLOSER LOOK: A local leader you should know

KAY FAIRCHILD GODFREDSEN

First deputy commissioner, Iowa Insurance Division

BY JOE GARDYASZ

Kay Fairchild Godfredsen recently began a key regulatory role as first deputy commissioner with the Iowa Insurance Division. She has spent most of her career in the insurance industry. Most recently, she held the role of assistant general counsel with Nationwide, where she provided specialized counsel for five Midwestern states. Last year, she was named a co-chair of the Global Insurance Symposium, a prominent industry event held annually in Des Moines. She has been chair of the Iowa Insurance and Financial Services Education Foundation, which provides scholarships to undergraduate students pursuing a career in insurance or financial services. Godfredsen has also served on the board of the Iowa Insurance Institute and on several Iowa State Bar Association committees.

Tell me about your most recent role at Nationwide.

I was a regulatory attorney at Nationwide; I was there for 12 years in that capacity. Prior to being an attorney for the company, I had handled claims. I had been a claims representative for two years; that really helped me understand the intersection of the contract and real people's lives, and I guess the noble purpose, as they say, of insurance. Claims often represent people's darkest hours, and I didn't understand until then how bad (those situations) could be. ... I can say it cemented a greater yearning for the law, because helping the consumer understand what they were purchasing and the regulatory aspect was just so interesting to me.

What are your primary responsibilities as first deputy commissioner?

As first deputy, I get to work with people who are leading areas such as SHIIP (Senior Health Insurance Information Program), product and producer licensing, and regulation. That (regulation) area is particularly exciting to me because Iowa continues to be a place where we can invite carriers to come and talk with us about innovative products, and to be on the forefront as things are ever-changing in insurance. Another area I will be working with is securities and other regulated industries, as well as market regulation and the fraud bureau. That (the fraud bureau) is an incredibly important part of the insurance division because so many millions of dollars of premium are lost due to fraud.

Are there particular areas of insurance innovation you see as most promising?

Consumers are asking insurers to meet their needs faster, and in ways that maybe we wouldn't have forecasted. There are some things out there that in our minds we perhaps wouldn't (think to) design. There are so many innovations that it's hard to list, from wearables to chatbots and things that can make insurance easier and simpler.

What's your perspective of the Global Insurance Symposium as a co-chair?

The symposium has been such a fantastic avenue for insurance carriers, insurtech and the regulators to come together in what I believe to be a unique environment and hear some really prominent speakers. ... The symposium has grown to be something that people across the country and other countries (value) as content-heavy (with topics such as autonomous cars, blockchain and artificial intelligence).

Tell me about your work with the Iowa Insurance and Financial Services Education Foundation.

I discovered insurance as a career by kind of stumbling into it. What I have found is that it's something we should talk about with people when they are going through their education. ... Through the education foundation, we talk to prospective students and interview them for the scholarship, but we also talk to them about insurance as a career. For the last half-dozen years that I have done interviews. I would mention to (students) the many avenues that an insurance career can take, and regulatory was one of those avenues. ... It's been great to shine a light on another career for students, and to hopefully keep them in Iowa.

What's the best career advice you've gotten as a female professional?

The best advice I've gotten is to build a network of trusted advisers, and enjoy the journey. Your journey is absolutely going to be unique — learn something every day.

Interesting books you've read lately?

A book that I've read again in the past year, and I even listen to it on recording because I love it so much, is "Good to Great." You can't go wrong with that, right?

What hobbies do you enjoy?

I don't know if you would even consider it a hobby, but on a regular basis the way I keep my head on and relieve stress is I work out, I break a sweat. ■

For routine prescriptions, a doctor could call in a prescription to a local pharmacist and the drug would be quickly checked against an insurer's formulary to determine whether the drug was covered and how much the patient would be charged for a co-pay.

"But in this world of complex medicine, the model has changed," said Aaron Crittenden, president and CEO of ReMy Health. He and his company are working to address that new model as a broker helping the doctor, the patient and the pharmacist.

"The physician can't answer that question; they're not incentivized to do so. So either their office staff spends hours on the phone with the insurer to find out how the patient is covered, or the pharmaceutical companies are setting up call centers to answer these questions. And they have spent a lot of time and money on that," Crittenden explained.

The company operates in a different sphere than medication therapy management companies such as West Des Moines-based Outcomes MTM, which specialize in providing one-on-one expert pharmacist consultation with patients to ensure they are taking their medications correctly. ReMy Health is also a different animal than pharmacy benefits management companies, which arose following the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003 to act as a middleman between the insurer, Medicare and the pharmacy, and negotiate lower drug prices.

"What we have built is a network that moves a lot of that information electronically in real time, to be able to tell a physician, a patient, the manufacturer and the payer as well whether the individual is covered, do they qualify for a co-pay card and what pharmacy they can get it at," Crittenden said. "It really automates the manual process that these call centers do to-day — that's the core of what we do."

Crittenden previously worked for Allscripts in Chicago, where he built data networks for the health care information technology company. That experience gave him an understanding of the significant challenges that pharmaceutical companies face in making their new products accessible to patients.

"So we decided that if we could build a data company that was business-to-business, we could solve a lot of these problems in health care," he said. "We got a small group of investors here in Des Moines together and started ReMy Health in 2013. Our big focus is how do we connect pharmaceutical manufacturers, patients, physicians, all in the complex disease space?

From a total volume perspective, specialty medications in the complex disease space make up less than 10 percent of the pharmaceutical market, Crittenden said.

"But if you think about the spending perspective, it's approaching 50 percent, and it will exceed 50 percent in the next few years. So the volume is small, but the impact is large financially," he said. "Aside from the financial implications of it, persons who are on these medications are also consuming a lot of health care. And typically these people aren't on one medication, they're on multiple medications."

Another service that ReMy Health provides on behalf of its clients is connecting patients with free and discounted drug programs that the pharmaceutical makers offer. However, the company doesn't support any of the opioid purchase assistance programs.

Beyond pharmaceuticals management, ReMy Health is working on taking the same model and automating processes for workers' compensation, long-term care and other health markets, Crittenden said.

The degree to which ReMy Health works with insurers varies by company, Crittenden said. In Iowa, the company does not directly connect with any insurance companies.

"There are large insurance companies we have direct relationships with," he said. "We help eliminate phone calls and faxes, which reduces the potential for error in information being passed along in the process of multiple phone calls. There's also a member satisfaction component. They also understand that these patients need this information, and they don't want their members jumping through hoops when they don't have to, so they're aligned on that."

Likewise, ReMy Health doesn't sell directly to employers, but Crittenden hinted that companies would benefit from asking their insurers, "Are you working with a service that does this?" How can a company like theirs obtain people's personal health information, given patient privacy laws? Crittenden said the drug manufacturers contract with ReMy Health under the umbrella of patient assistance, and are not receiving access to individual patient data.

The company has no competitors doing what it does in Iowa, and probably none that are like it in the United States.

"Right now other companies that are doing this are operating manually in a call-center model," Crittenden said. "But from a technology perspective in how we're approaching it, it's primarily 'blue ocean.' Similarly from a workers' compensation (management) perspective, there's a lot of manual work being done in that space, but we have not seen a network being able to step into that space. Another thing about our company is that we're constantly building out new solutions for our clients at their request."

The company was launched by Crittenden with Brian Tait — whom he worked with at Allscripts — along with Brad Krehlik, who had owned a jewelry manufacturing company in Des Moines before founding Meals from the Heartland. The three of them worked from a finished attic above a garage in Chicago before moving to Greater Des Moines. Their company now has about 18 employees, with plans to hire between 10 and 15 more within the next year.

"We're also looking at bringing in a call center to Des Moines to manage what technology can't manage," Crittenden said. "We realize that technology can't do it all, that at some point you also have people involved in the calls to facilitate the process."

Michael Andreski, an associate professor of social and administrative pharmacy at Drake University College of Pharmacy and Health Sciences, said, "I'm not surprised that something like this has popped up, because these programs are difficult for the average person to navigate."

Although Andreski had not heard of the company until introduced to it by the Business Record, he said it appears it could potentially speed up searches for available medications.

"Until this company, there was no place to go and easily find an entry into that system, whereas this company seems to be setting it up to see if a program is available and get it set up for the patient much more quickly than usual," he said. "Maybe less than a couple of hours rather than a couple of days. If I'm a pharma company, that would allow quicker access to my patient access programs, so they can provide some of these potentially life-saving medications to some of these patients."

Could this lead to lower health care costs? It could, Andreski said, if there's a condition where a delay may lead to a patient being hospitalized, or if it delays a patient being able to return to work or being a caregiver, he noted.

SO WE DECIDED THAT IF WE COULD BUILD A DATA COMPANY THAT WAS

BUSINESS-TO-BUSINESS,

WE COULD SOLVE A LOT OF THESE PROBLEMS IN HEALTH CARE.

Aaron Crittenden president and CEO, ReMy Health

THE PROBLEM

Physicians and their patients have a difficult time obtaining health plan coverage information for high-cost pharmaceuticals that are prescribed to address complex medical conditions such as rheumatoid arthritis and hepatitis C. The founders realized the issues that drugmakers and physicians were having as they were selling electronic health record systems for Allscripts in Chicago.

THE INNOVATION

A national network with real-time data provided by several major pharmaceutical manufacturers that automates the time-consuming process of tracking down information about new and high-cost medications, as well as connecting patients with free or discounted drug programs offered by the manufacturers.

HOW THEY DID IT

ReMy Health's founders assembled a small group of highwealth individual investors in Greater Des Moines to fund the company in 2013. The company built a data network and contracted with pharmaceutical companies to serve as the information broker between physicians, insurance companies, drugmakers and patients. ReMy Health works within the specialty medications niche that accounts for less than 10 percent of the total pharmaceutical market by volume, but accounts for nearly 50 percent of drug spending.

THE PAYOFF

The company quickly became profitable and has remained debt-free, its founders say. It currently has contracts with eight big-name pharmaceutical makers and has deals pending to add up to 10 additional drug manufacturers by the end of this year. In October, the company will move from a 6,300-square-foot space in the Liberty Building to a 10,000-square-foot space in the Bank of America building downtown. ReMy Health is now working on automating processes for workers' compensation, long-term care and other health markets. ■

POWET BREAKFAST SERIES

MARCH TO 1 MILLION

Greater Des Moines is booming. We're the fastest growing city in the Midwest, and population projections have our region on pace to eclipse 1 million residents by 2040.

But with lightning population growth comes a variety of challenges: Infrastructure could be strained, resources might become scarce, workforce demographics will shift, leaders will change, city identities and politics will evolve, and, gulp, you might even find yourself stalled in traffic on your way to work.

Some of these challenges are already being felt, so we've assembled an expert panel for a discussion aimed at illuminating the challenges and opportunities that lie ahead.

Join us as we help ensure that as Greater Des Moines marches toward one million people, the region and business community are positioned to continue their momentum in a sustainable way that allows us to keep our strengths and core identity while being resilient in the face of changes to come.

WE'LL DISCUSS QUESTIONS SUCH AS:

- · What types of strains will growth put on our infrastructure and transportation systems?
- · What strategies will position Des Moines for sustainable growth?
- · How do our local governments, chambers and institutions need to adjust?
- · What will the demographic makeup of your workforce look like?
- $\boldsymbol{\cdot}$  What strategies should we pursue to continue and accelerate growth?
- · How can businesses capitalize on the opportunities that come with growth?
- · How will we retain the characteristics that make our business community unique?

Retail shakeout

Consultant: Downtown could win in expected shakeout of overbuilt Greater Des Moines retail

BY PERRY BEEMAN

Consultant Maureen McAvey said Greater Des Moines had too much retail even before the Altoona outlet mall was developed, and downtown Des Moines should pick its retail shots during a likely storefront shakeup in the metro.

McAvey, a Minneapolis-based retail authority who once worked for the Urban Land Institute, discussed an update of Greater Des Moines' 5-year-old retail study with area leaders recently in the East Village.

She spoke of the differing strengths of different parts of downtown before noting an interesting phenomenon in the metro: a glut of retail.

"You have retail coming out of your ears in the suburbs," McAvey said.

"We are not overbuilt, we are underdemolished," McAvey said. "We will lose 20 to 30 percent of our retail" in coming years.

The national average is 23.6 square feet of retail per person. Greater Des Moines has 34 square feet, McAvey said, and that doesn't count the 300,000 square feet at the Outlets of Des Moines, in Altoona.

That means downtown Des Moines leaders should be ready to recruit businesses that might want to move to downtown from the suburbs. And they should make sure the amenities are in place to attract more stores like the highly sought West Elm, a home goods store in the East Village.

Retail in the United States is at a level that is 10 times bigger than other developed countries, but "it will not last," McAvey noted. Online sales aren't as big as you think — 8.5 percent of the market — but they are growing fast. And consumers are buying online and picking up at stores in a model used by the downtown Hy-Vee store, for example.

In addition, new stores are focusing on smaller parts of the market — like offering a really great burger or specialty cookware — which has meant trouble for Macy's and other big retailers. "If you are trying to be all things to all people, you are in trouble."

As retailers consolidate in larger cities, secondary markets like Greater Des Moines will suffer, she added.

Downtown now has 80,000 workers, and 11,000 residents. The millennial population is showing above-average growth and the area has seen a gain of 1.4 percent a year over the past five year.

Businesses that might be a good fit for downtown, according to McAvey, include:

- Clothing alterations.
- Child care.
- Adult day care.
- Casual but stylish clothing.

Talk about a year-round farmers market in the Kaleidoscope also continue, though McAvey didn't mention that project in her East Village presentation today, said Tim Leach, senior vice president of downtown development for the Greater Des Moines Partnership.

McAvey spent much of her time noting the attributes of various sections of downtown, which together have drawn about $1.5 billion in projects lately.

McAvey suggested jazzing up the skywalks with art and maybe even live artists working in an impromptu studio.

"They should be more creative and handsome," she said of the skywalks. "They are a little bit dull. Nice, and useful, but dull."

Leach said the Partnership and others now will discuss using McAvey's work to develop a more specific strategic plan for downtown retail. Much of that work may revolve around rejiggering parking and signs to make it easier to shop downtown, a lure for new developers.

The study was supported by the Greater Des Moines Partnership, Capital Crossroads, Urban Land Institute and the city of Des Moines.

am Plecas was born to Serbian immigrants Joseph and Helen Plecas. In 1935 he attended Frisbee Elementary, Roosevelt and Des Moines Tech school until enlisting in the US Army during the Korean War. In 1955 he married his high school sweetheart Barbara McIntyre of Valley Junction and started his furniture career with McIntyre's Furniture and Design Gallery and later taught at West Des Moines Schools' continuing education program and Drake University. Working for Harold and Mildred McIntyre in 1954 until 1977 when he and Barbara purchased Bruce & Carlson Furniture in Des Moines and later Bacot Furniture of Ankeny.

Sam retired 20 years ago to Mesa Arizona after owning and operating three successful furniture stores and interior design galleries, where many of his vendors were: Flexsteel, Drexel, American of Martinsville, Pullman, Henredon, Broyhill, Rembrandt Lamps and more. Sam and Barbara worked with the area's finest home builders.

In 2015 Sam learned of his former wife's Dementia and a un-operable brain tumor and it was decided that he leave the comfort of his home in Mesa Arizona and return to his first love after 36 years of separation. Sam came to live with Barbara as her health advocate and assist in her transition to Wesley Acres, John's Harbor residential facility where she now resides. August of 2017 also brought new life to Sam and the furniture business as the family decided to create McIntyre's Antiques and Collectibles after deciding how to liquidate the several homes of the Plecas' Family. After much conversation and planning, the business was birthed and many of the West

Des Moines and Valley Junction families that were patrons of the former family furniture galleries have now learned love of family heirlooms in purchasing or consigning their own belongings.

EXTREME THANKS

Thanks to the amazing support and dedication from hundreds of trade partners, volunteers and sponsors, together we built a brand new Ronald McDonald House for central lowa. The 18-bedroom, 18-bathroom house now spans more than 17,000 square feet. It is a "home away from home" for lowans and their children to relax and rejuvenate in between or during medical care at nearby hospitals.

Thanks to your efforts, the Ronald McDonald House will remain a fixture for lowa families for years to come.

Thank you from everyone at Hubbell Realty Company!

There's no single way to establish a specific culture in the workplace — there are dozens.

That's what the Business Record discovered when checking with Central Iowa employers and organizations on how they create specific atmospheres within their walls. In fact, we received so much input, you'll read more about area businesses' cultures in future issues.

For the first stop, we checked into the ongoing project of Mainframe Studios, the nonprofit group working to transform the former Qwest office space on Keosauqua Way into a permanent affordable space for artists. So far, up to 80 artists fill 65 working studios as the project continues in the 150,000 square feet over five floors.

In one studio, three sculptors share space and a kiln. One, Linda Lewis, moved in in July. She labored on a recent morning over hinges that she was creating and incorporating into a fascinating piece of a woman's head. "Isn't it a pretty space?" Lewis said.

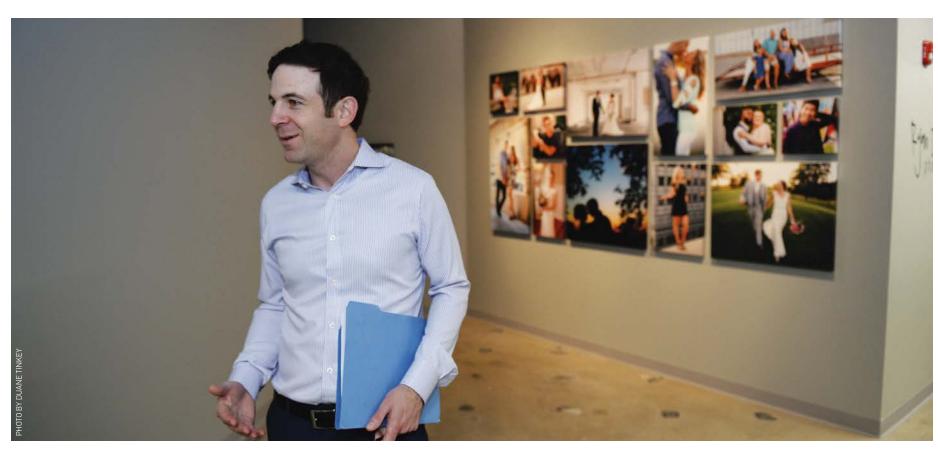

And it is. There are muted lights, neutral-colored walls, loads of windows to allow in natural light, and industrial pipes and elements in the background. There's nothing intrusive getting in the way of creating.

The design incorporated shared spaces. Collaboration is happening naturally, Director Siobhan Spain noted, with artists leaving doors open to their studios. One even organized a potluck recently.

The neighboring studios house the likes of commercial photographers, graphic designers, game developers and more. Some include artists who are forging careers in their creative passions after spending years in the corporate world.

"This first class of artists shows how careers are made by art," said Spain. "We're making this building for artists and their entrepreneurial spirit."

Mainframe Studios didn't happen overnight. In 2009, local developer Justin Mandelbaum returned to Des Moines with the idea for the artists' studio. He had experience with a similar project in Massachusetts that involved living space for artists, too. But, he said, that for-profit formula wasn't sustainable.

Justin Mandelbaum had the idea for Mainframe Studios when he returned to his hometown in 2009.

The trend, Spain and Mandelbaum explained, is that artists move into an area, make it attractive and more economically viable with their presence, and then a developer comes in and buys out the spaces that artists had used. That displacement has happened in Des Moines with some artist workspaces being bought and turned into apartments.

Mandelbaum and Spain want to ensure that Mainframe Studios lasts for generations. Its financial backing and donations are structured to keep the space low-cost for the artists — $7 per square foot per year.

There's still a ways to go, with the second and third floors of the four-story building still not built out. And donations are still needed.

"This is a business deal," Mandelbaum explained as he showed a map on his iPad. It's clear he's involved in the details. He talked about the development's history and how its financial structure will work.

"I wanted to do this for my hometown," he said. The building is still a work in progress.

Now there are bookings being scheduled for an event space, a wait list for the other studios that will be built out, and an open studio event on Oct. 21 from 2 to 6 p.m. to bring the community in.

The hope is to expand that to a monthly event. "The goal is to basically do a farmers market for artists," Mandelbaum said.

While he declined to say if he has creative pursuits, it's clear Mainframe Studios' culture for artists is his masterpiece-in-progress. ■

Work culture ideas

The Business Record asked for ideas on how local workplaces create their business cultures, and the business community responded — in a big way.

Here are several ideas contributed (and look for more in an upcoming issue or issues).

- From Happy Medium, a social media networking firm: The business hosts HMU, or Happy Medium University, "as a way for team members to learn from each other and spend time together." Yoga, coding and public speaking have been topics.
- From Grinnell Mutual Reinsurance Co.: "Quarterly Trust Talks" are held with leaders that go beyond work, getting into personal lives and employees' interests. A Q&A session allows employees to ask about anything.
- From Quester, a market research firm in Windsor Heights: Pets can visit, and there is an upstairs condo that out-of-town workers can use when they are in Des Moines.

THE WAITING GAME

Big downtown projects put a premium on patience

BY KENT DARR

Cottonwood trees, maybe a few scrub maples along with them, are being removed from a big swath of former railroad land in an area that will be transformed over 20 years into a downtown Des Moines neighborhood called Gray's Station.

Tree clearing might draw a yawn from some folks, but a project spread over 20 years and bringing an estimated $250 million in value from a range of single-family homes to apartments should open some eyes.

Hubbell Realty Co. is the developer, noteworthy if for no other reason than it was a mere 11 years ago that the company entered the downtown residential market with the rehab of its former headquarters.

Notice we're chewing up time by the decade here, and why not? Much of downtown development has occurred in fits and starts; grandiose schemes disappeared to be replaced by others. Eventually, something got done. And not just by Hubbell.

It's easy to forget that the Western Gateway continues to take shape under a vision that was first presented in the late 1980s. One noteworthy element, creating an oxbow lake on the Raccoon River south of Meredith Corp. headquarters, went by the wayside. On the other hand, who could have dreamed that the architectural marvel that will be the Krause Gateway Center would overlook the John and Mary Pappajohn Sculpture Garden?

In the late 1990s, a movie theater, maybe a Barnes & Noble bookstore and an Old Navy clothing store were imagined for Court Avenue. Move ahead five years, and Hubbell Realty and Harry Bookey had plans for an entertainment district that would draw young people to the area. Not to be. Instead, that team built condos and apartments on the east side of Fourth Street and along Court.

Find yourself at the southwest corner of Fourth and Court in 2014, and city leaders were accepting a plan for a grocery store and apartment building there, beating out competition that included a movie theater with other entertainment venues, not to mention a year-round farmers market.

The Hy-Vee Inc. grocery store fed dreams of apartment towers, and now the city has two in the planning stages, one at Fifth Avenue and Walnut Street, another at Seventh and Walnut streets.

Justin Mandelbaum had proposed the theater and entertainment center for what became the Hy-Vee store. Little surprise that he plans a movie theater at Fifth and Court that will be part of the high-rise project at Fifth and Walnut.

Just landing the project came in fits and starts for Mandelbaum. After working on plans for the project for a couple of years, he had competition from Blackbird Investments, the firm that plans a high-rise at Seventh and Walnut. Mandelbaum won the competition for Fifth and Walnut.

Obviously, it pays to keep coming back. And in saying that, it is worth noting that Blackbird is bringing its tower out of the ashes of the former Younkers Building, a redevelopment project that was leveled by fire in 2014.

Some projects disappear and return when least expected. The recently completed City Hall parking garage along Robert D. Ray Drive between East Locust Street and East Grand Avenue is proof of that.

In 2007, Hansen Development presented a plan to build office and retail buildings on the lot; as part of a land swap, the city could put parking on the former Bud Mulcahy Jeep dealership at East Second and East Walnut streets. That plan was lost to the Great Recession. Hansen focused its efforts instead on the former Jeep dealership, building City Square Lofts along East Walnut and Staybridge Suites along East Locust.

In 2016, a development and investment team of Jim and Sloan Cownie, Paul Hayes, Jake Christensen and Tim Rypma came along with a plan for the City Hall parking lot, proposing a parking garage large enough to accommodate City Hall staff and visitors, guests of Embassy Suites, and occupants and customers of an apartment and retail development that the group developed at 219 E. Grand Ave., as well as visitors to the East Village. Under an agreement with the city, the developers could bring plans for office, retail and apartment buildings to flank the garage on the north and south.

The city of Des Moines opened the competition for both the City Hall parking garage and what became the downtown Hy-Vee after Hubbell Realty President CEO Rick Tollakson protested the initial designation of developers for both sites.

These days, Hubbell is sitting on two sites that have defied development efforts.

Gray's Station is one. In 2005, the industrial and railroad land was part of what was conceived as a 125-acre urban village called River Point West that was laid out by Minneapolis developer Sherman Associates Inc., the company that was brought to town in the late 1990s after city leaders felt that local developers weren't generating enough downtown projects.

Sherman has renovated historic buildings and built apartments and condominiums downtown, but after making some infrastructure improvements, River Point West stalled, due in large part to the Great Recession.

River Point West, the development arm that would buy properties for an area called Gray's Landing, narrowed its focus to city-owned land between Southwest Ninth and 11th streets, and immediately south of Martin Luther King Jr. Parkway. In recent years, Sherman has built two apartment buildings and a hotel, is in the planning stages of a child care center, and is said to be considering an office building and, possibly, another hotel.

Regarding the former railroad land, Greater Des Moines homebuilder Rob Orton said in 2015 that he wanted to buy the property, but he decided the cost of environmental cleanup was too steep.

Hubbell closed on its purchase last month, more than willing to foot a bill of between $3 million and $4 million to remove creosote-soaked railroad ties and steel rails, and perform soil monitoring tests for the next year before building on the property.

And Hubbell is sitting on what many believe to be the real trophy of downtown properties, the site of the former Riverfront YMCA on the west bank of the Des Moines River.

Once again, there have been development plans aplenty for the site. In 2007, developer Jon Garnaas forecast a project that could include a hotel, office and retail space, underground parking, residential suites and, possibly, a fitness center.

In 2013, the Riverfront Y at 101 Locust St. was part of a land swap that resulted in the construction of a convention center hotel and the reconstruction of the former Polk County Convention Complex into the Wellmark YMCA.

Three years later, Hubbell bought the property. Most recently, it was chosen as the preferred site for a $140 million federal courthouse. Hubbell and the city of Des Moines scuttled that plan. Under the agreement, the city will buy the property if it cannot agree with Hubbell on a development plan for the site by May 31, 2018.

As for the site of a new federal courthouse, that's shaping up as another story of fits and starts. ■

Take a mental health day

During a recent physical, a doctor asked my neighbor if he experienced signs of depression.

"I have been on edge lately," he confessed.

"Last week, I yelled at my wife for things that really didn't matter. And I've been feeling down. Do you think it's depression?"

"You're a Democrat, aren't you?" the doctor replied.

"Yes," my neighbor said. "But what's that got to do with it?"

"You're a Democrat, and Trump has been president for nine months," the doctor said. "If you weren't depressed, I'd be worried about you.

"Heck, I'm a Democrat, and I'm depressed," the doctor said.

That story is anecdotal at best.

But there may be something to the fact that people who six months ago were worried about the sanity of the president are now worried about their own mental health.

I know. I wondered about my own mental stability when I got caught up recently in President Donald Trump's swipes at the National Football League.

I found myself making arguments about why it did, or did not, matter that a group of highly paid professional athletes had decided to drop to one knee when "The Star Spangled Banner" was played.

I liked Sen. Chuck Grassley's comment that the only time he kneels is to pray, which is what I assumed the NFL players were doing: praying for an end to racism.

I found it amazing that these big guys, whose job is to beat up opponents, were kneeling, which is a sign of respect. They weren't holding a fist in the air, like the Black Panthers did 40 years ago. They were kneeling.

And for that, their president called them a bunch of bums and worse and said they should be fired.

Almost in the same breath, Trump was saber-rattling at North Korea, threatening to use "devastating" military action and predicting that it "wouldn't be around much longer."

His rhetoric prompted North Korean officials to say, in effect, that they believed the U.S. had declared war, which led to denials from U.S. diplomats.

Up until then, I never could have imagined a situation in which U.S. officials would need to deny that the president of the United States had declared war.

It was a scene right out of the 1964 movie "Dr. Strangelove," a political satire that thrusts the U.S. and USSR into nuclear war. The subtitle of that movie was "How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb."

Which seems to be what Trump wants us to do now.

But maybe things are not what they seem.

I have a friend who says that Trump isn't insane, that he's a genius who is using these situations as diversions because he knows he'll never be able to do everything he's promised to do.

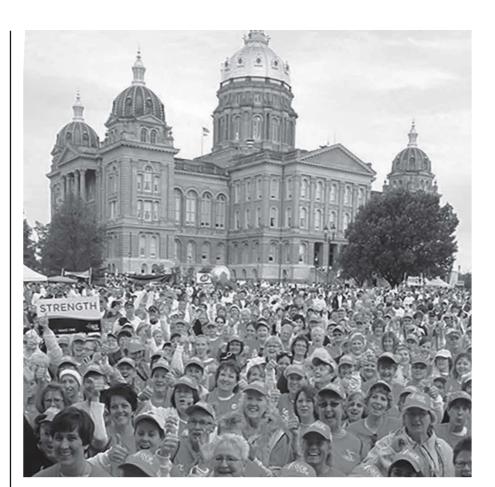

My friend says that Trump knows he can distract attention by periodically throwing out meaningless pieces of red meat.

Banning transgender people from the military is one example. Questioning the patriotism of NFL players is another.

Trump knows that when we are arguing about those issues we won't be asking about how he plans to rebuild our nation's infrastructure, or who will pay for his border wall, my friend says.

The president knows he can't solve health care or get the tax cuts he wants. And he'd just as soon nobody talk about the budget deficit or the abysmal way we treat veterans, or climate change, or clean water and all of the dozens of other real issues.

But here's what really worries me. Does Trump know the difference between calling NFL players a bunch of bums and threatening to nuke North Korea? ■

Is marketing dead?

I just finished a fascinating new book, "Killing Marketing: How Innovative Businesses are Turning Marketing Cost into Profit," by Joe Pulizzi and Robert Rose. Joe and Robert are the creators of the mega-conference Content Marketing World, and Joe has written other books, like "Content Inc.," "Epic Content Marketing" and "Managing Content Marketing."

Catching a theme?

The core message of their new book is acknowledging that the marketing world, as we have known it since the dawn of the big three (print, radio and TV), is our past and that marketing doesn't have to be just a cost center anymore. When done well, brands can actually create a profit center from their marketing efforts. Instead of your marketing requiring additional financial resources, what if it generated new dollars? We've all heard the idea that brands should become media companies. You may not want to take your company quite that far. But wouldn't you like to make money with your marketing efforts?

Let's take a step back before we look at the future. Traditional marketing has been primarily advertising — the renting of space on someone else's channel to earn attention and brand awareness and to alter the consumer's behavior. Even PR falls under that description. Instead of buying an ad, the brand or their agency would pitch their story to the editorial side of the advertising channels. Their goal was to have a story written about them or their offerings that would create the same results as paid advertising would have generated.

Along came the internet and suddenly consumers found their voice. Until that shift, they'd been our silent audience. But as it became easier to share opinions on message boards, forums, social media channels, websites and review outlets, they got louder and louder.

Initially as a defensive mechanism, brands began using the internet too — creating content to fight for search engine position and to balance the consumer's voice. But the brands discovered what probably seems to you to be a very simple marketing truth: that when the brands provided valuable content and helpful information, the consumers would create a connection and magnify the brand's reach by sharing the content and inviting others in.

On a mega-level, this is what Johnson & Johnson has done with Baby-Center.com. What started as a simple extension of their core website now reaches more than 45 million parents a month across the globe and offers content in nine different languages. Eight of every 10 U.S. mothers use BabyCenter.com.

Odds are your goals aren't quite so lofty. Which is awesome because that means you can replicate your version of the results faster and with a smaller level of investment. The internet and digital content have leveled the playing field. It's why small brands like BigPoppaSmokers.com have crushed their competition, stolen the market share of much bigger companies and created a brand that garners incredible amplification of their value from the consumers who love them.

The book isn't suggesting that you abandon your core business model and become an organization that generates revenue the way a traditional media company does. Nor is it suggesting that you should abandon your paid and earned media efforts. For most organizations, there will always be a benefit to those channels.

But what the authors are suggesting is that businesses today also need a profit-generating owned media strategy that will give you an unfair competitive advantage.

In next week's column, we'll explore some of the suggestions the book offers that seem reasonable for small to midsized organizations to experiment with as they build out their 2018 marketing strategy and budget. Based on the book, you just may want to shift some of your dollars to some new avenues.

This week's QR code is a link to 75 examples of how brands are leveraging content in this new model.
