SHENANDOAH NATIONAL PARK

Shenandoah National Park, just outside the town of Front Royal limits, includes breathtaking sights such as Skyline Drive, part of the Appalachian Trail, many stunning waterfalls, incredible views and a playhouse of fascinating wildlife.

When the State of Virginia amassed 196,000 acres of land in the early 1930's, Shenandoah National Park was born. Members of the Civilian Conservation Corps – a government program that provided jobs during the Great Depression – were given the task of building the new park's facilities. They constructed picnic grounds, campgrounds, trails, rock walls, bridges, Skyline Drive and over 340 recreational buildings within the park. The official dedication of Shenandoah National Park took place July 3, 1936.

Its forests, now consisting mainly of oak and hickory trees, are nearly a hundred years old. Hosting these forests are 60 different peaks greater than 3,000 feet above sea level. The park also currently boasts 75 scenic overlooks, Visitors Centers, educational programs, great campgrounds and over 500 miles of trails. 101 miles of these trails are part of the Appalachian Trail.

History Up Close and Personal

THE BATTLE OF FRONT ROYAL

The Battle of Front Royal was part of a plan formulated by Stonewall Jackson to take control of the Shenandoah Valley. Confederate Colonel Thomas Flourney, working with Turner Ashby, successfully executed General Jackson's plan of retaking Front Royal, VA from the Union Army.

On May 23, 1862, Union Commander Colonel John Kenley, fortified Camp Hill with his two regiments of cavalry and artillery, extending in an arc from South Fork to Happy Creek. Confederate forces approaching Front Royal from the south made a small assault at Buckton Depot, cutting the communications between the small Front Royal detachment and the main Union Army, stationed in Strasburg. Part of the Confederates remained at Buckton Depot, controlling the railroads and effectively preventing Union reinforcements from being sent to Front Royal.

Confederate infantry advanced through town, splitting their forces. A column sneaked around the east flank of the Union line, attempting to force them into retreat without a frontal attack. Union Colonel Kenley, upon discovering that the enemy cavalry reinforcement was advancing, retreated from Camp Hill, heading his troops across the South and North Forks bridges, attempting to burn them as he went. His efforts were foiled when the Confederates extinguished the fire. After repairing the bridges, Confederate Colonel Flourney continued to pursue the fleeing Northerners closely. Kenley kept retreating along the Winchester turnpike and after some miles turned to position his forces for an offensive move and used the heights on either side of the pike to his advantage. Flourney's cavalry quickly surrounded the small Union forces and pushed their surrender after Kenley was wounded.

The battle that took the lives of eighty-two Union and thirty-six Confederate soldiers ended and put General Stonewall Jackson one step closer to the eventual success of his Shenandoah Campaign.
