While the meeting and event planning industry started 2020 strong, the coronavirus pandemic brought a devastating blow to the industry and forced it to adjust practices to what is expected to be the new normal.

In the first quarter, many venues reported an increase in overall bookings compared with the same time the previous year.

“Prior to the pandemic, the outlook for 2020 was very positive as bookings were up,” said Charlene Ferris, director of meeting and event services for the National Cowboy & Western Heritage Museum.

This year started out on the upswing for other event venues as well.

Shelby Kirkes, manager of special events for Oklahoma City Dodgers baseball, also reported that 2020 bookings were higher than years past.

“Meetings and events that had booked in previous years were renewing early to secure dates for 2020, and there was also a positive amount of new business coming in,” she said.

Hilton Garden Inn & Edmond Conference Center’s performance from January to mid-March was 35% better than 2019, and the venue’s forecast showed a 25% increase over 2019, said Sherri Banister, director of sales.

Hiring and demand for workers in early 2020 was high, with a shortage of qualified workers available.

“In January 2020, we reported the largest number of teammates on payroll since the property opened in 2015,” said Tasha Houck-Barnett, director of sales and marketing at the Embassy Suites Oklahoma City Downtown/Medical Center.

“However, labor was one of the biggest issues facing the hotel industry pre-pandemic. There was a significant shortage of talent, and some hotels were recruiting from non-traditional industries and compromising on experience just to get open positions filled,” Houck-Barnett said. “Hotel supply was at an all-time high with new hotels opening everywhere; demand was high supporting the new openings, yet labor wasn’t available to meet the demands.”

The COVID-19 crisis brought a near-complete stoppage to the industry, and it is hard to determine when the meeting and event planning industry will recover from the effects of the pandemic.
“Our current estimate, based on the volume of cancellations, and the response we are getting from guests, businesses and event planners, is an eight- to 14-month recovery period,” said Banister. “We don’t have enough data at this point on booking volume and pace, especially since it dropped by more than 90% for rooms and by 100% for meetings and events.”

Embassy Suites’ Houck-Barnett said she doesn’t expect full recovery of staffing and events until at least the second quarter of 2021.

“This is a conservative estimate as this is an ever-evolving situation,” said Houck-Barnett, who predicts that, as restrictions ease, there will be an immediate need for smaller instructional training sessions.

While several larger events affected by city mandates have been postponed until later this year, there is concern that the devastated economy will hinder the return to pre-pandemic booking and revenue levels.

“There’s a chance of losing some business that will likely cut back unnecessary costs for the remainder of the year,” Kirkes said.

In recovery and beyond, the pandemic will have a lasting effect on the meeting and event planning industry.

“The pandemic has provided us an opportunity to evaluate and improve our practices, said Ferris. “Social distancing, safety and sanitation guidelines will continue to be practiced and improved.”

Banister anticipates an increase in virtual meetings and events, or events being held as a combination of live and virtual. More emphasis will be placed on hygiene and service procedures, with an overall emphasis on reducing points of contact as many interpretations of social distancing will become the new normal.

“We have to be realistic about how attendees will judge their safety and plan ahead,” said Houck-Barnett. “This includes incorporating social distancing, menu planning and assuming smaller crowds, even months after we are allowed to gather. Social distancing limits the ability to host larger events because they will require twice the meeting space.”

Despite the challenges, she is hopeful for the future of the industry post-pandemic.

“People still have a longing to meet and connect, and I am confident that will never change,” she said. “While people will continue to be cautious, there will be a more robust desire to feel personally connected after spending months isolated. Therefore, we may see a surge in people hosting events on a larger scale.”
The main issue that attendees of virtual meetings and events face is distraction. To combat that challenge, meeting planners must work on fostering attendee engagement and connection in the virtual setting.

“The top challenges for a meeting organizer hosting a virtual meeting include determining what content is relevant to the attendees, how to make the meeting engaging and meaningful, and what components or platforms to include,” said Brian Ferrell, president of factor 110. “Whether it is a one-hour program or a two-day virtual experience, there is thought that is given to the organization of the content, general session speakers, opportunities for networking and contact with other attendees, highlighting sponsors and exhibitors, and being creative on how you create an immersive experience.”

As with any event, establishing goals is a must.

“Every meeting and event is different and the organizer should always go back to the goals, mission, purpose, and budget of the organization to help determine the best way to serve attendees,” Ferrell said.

Having clearly determined goals also helps meeting and event planners as they interact with other providers involved in the event.

“It is important to work with whatever professionals that you hire out for services to reach goals because they might have different ideas about how you can reach them,” said Abby Wolfe, director of marketing and communications, Cory’s Audio Visual.

Pay close attention to speakers.

“Choosing your presenter is one of the most important things you can do to increase engagement and attendee experience,” Wolfe said. “When a presenter is not animated enough, it is really hard to hold an audience’s attention, and it also comes across as overprepared.”

Not all great in-person speakers translate to great online speakers, said Jane Anderson, president of Edge Productions.

“Schedule speakers that know how to use the online platform to connect with their audience,” she said.

Format and delivery are also important for engagement.

“When taking a meeting virtual, think about how long your sessions are. What your in-person meeting may have been, time-wise, maybe it needs to be shortened on a virtual experience,” said Anderson. “It all goes back to what are you trying to accomplish for the attendee, and what will be most comfortable for the attendee?” Online attendees have shorter attention spans and the content needs to match. Shorter presentation times should be considered.”

Anderson suggests hiring a qualified... emcee to keep audience energy up and the flow of the program moving forward.

“The emcee brings more of an engaging rather than just a viewing experience,” she said. “An emcee can deliver a brand message for opening remarks, and can introduce a speaker. They can also monitor Q&A if the presenter is live, and announce awards.”

Both meeting organizers and attendees should use interaction and connection to help ward off distraction. Q&A’s and polling are ways to gauge if attendees are engaged, and if they are understanding and receiving the content in the intended way.

“Many people, when they think of a virtual meeting, they think that it all has to be live, but there are opportunities where your speaker could be pre-recorded and then Q&A can be addressed in real time by the speaker,” Anderson suggested.

Also, attendee interaction begins for an event well before login time.

“Planners need to think about what they can send out in advance of the meeting so that attendees can be prepared,” Anderson said.

Attendees play an active role in pre-event interaction as well. Registering in advance, blocking time off on the calendar, setting reminders and reviewing materials provided before the meeting can help offset any feelings of disconnect. Similarly, interaction can continue after the virtual event ends.

“Planners need to look at what can be done in follow-up to a virtual meeting,” Anderson said. “Can a recording be posted for on-demand, for reference back, or could there be forums where people could gather to discuss the topic after, which help create a sense of community as well?”

Technology can make or break a virtual event.

“Not only can professionals provide and deliver equipment, setting you up to be successful, but they also can help by being a partner in reaching your goals,” Wolfe said.

Professionals can also help by speeding up transition time and incorporating graphics into the presentation.

“If you are recording your meeting for future use, having somebody who can help you intertwine great graphical content with video content into your record-ings is invaluable,” she said.

Anderson said to have a plan for how to handle technical difficulties for presenters as well as for attendees. The best way to resolve technical issues for speakers is to communicate in advance.

“Our suggestion is to use two phone calls, meetings or touch points with the presenters,” she said.

“The first is to go over the technical requirements, internet connection, and how their presentation will be set up, what their lighting looks like, and how to get the best audio and video. Then do a separate phone call for the rehearsal.”

Attendees should set their goals for what they hope to get out of the meeting or event. A colleague attending the same virtual event can be an accountability partner to share and discuss information with.

Ferrell encourages attendees to be actively involved.

“Provide feedback to your meeting organizer on how you would like to engage and receive content, serve on a planning or education committee and help bring new ideas to the table.”

In many ways, government meeting planners work in similar fashion to other meeting planners. However, there are some tips specific to government meeting planning that can help ensure the process goes smoothly.

“State and federal guidelines are different, and each state’s guidelines are different, and different state agencies each have unique guidelines they’re required to follow,” said Allison Woodard, human resources development operations manager for the Oklahoma Department of Mental Health and Substance Abuse Services. “Familiarity with state purchasing laws will serve you well and circumvent misunderstandings.”

“You have to keep up on regulations,” said Shari Goad, event manager for Public Strategies. “The Government Services Administration publishes per diem rates every Oct. 1, the beginning of the federal fiscal year, and those apply whether we are traveling on an individual basis or planning a conference or event.”

The bidding and contracting process is more detailed and takes longer with government meetings.

“There are certain clauses that have to be incorporated into any type of contract,” Goad said. “In the RFP process, I will include an attachment stating the terms and conditions that need to be incorporated into the contract. If there are any issues with that, we know it up front, and that may be a deal-breaker.”

Woodard agrees.

“Ensuring your request for proposal is thorough before sending out the bid for location is key,” she said.

Goad points out that the contracting process takes longer because approval is required at many levels. She recommends providing the supplier with as much detail and information up front as possible and to use the Society of Government Meeting Professionals as a resource.

“SGMP’s supplier members, primarily hotels and convention and visitors bureaus, want to network with government meeting planners, and they are actively pursuing government business,” said Goad, who is president of the Oklahoma chapter of SGMP.

Goad describes some hotels as government-friendly, meaning that they want government business and have accounted for a certain percentage of government business. These suppliers are actively seeking and working with government entities on a regular basis. Some hotels cannot accommodate the GSA rate unless it is during a certain season.

“When I am trying to source a hotel, whether it is in Oklahoma or nationwide, I don’t rule any out,” Goad suggests.

“Some government planners think that certain properties would never offer the government rate, when, in fact, they do if you happen to hit them at a time when they need the business.”

Perhaps the biggest improvement in the industry, according to Goad, has been hotels having a dedicated sales manager who works specifically with the government events.

Goad’s strategy is to be transparent with the budget when working with suppliers from the start.

“You just don’t know until you ask,” she said. “In a corporate group, there might be a lot of extra dollars to spend, but that is generally not the case with the government.”

Woodard said setting timelines and dates for check-ins with suppliers can help avoid big headaches in the days leading up to an event.

Tom Leatherbee, director of community services for the city of Del City, shares specific insight on meetings in government space.

“It is essential to know the relevant Open Meeting Act and public notice requirements and how they apply, or do not apply, to the meeting in question,” he said. “Similarly, one must be cognizant of requirements related to accessibility, both under the Americans with Disabilities Act and any more specific local regulations. Most importantly, understand that government users have different personal and organizational backgrounds versus private sector users, particularly as it relates to experience with technology.”

The COVID-19 pandemic has affected the entire meeting and event planning industry, and government meetings have certainly been affected significantly.

“Immediately we saw the need to transition events to virtual platforms,” said Goad, noting that those events that did not go virtual have been postponed, and new events are still being planned and scheduled.

“In the corporate world, when the economy is down, many businesses will slow down and business meetings follow,” she said. “With the government, there is still a need to conduct government business and have their meetings. They are going to happen, regardless of what the economy is doing. The question is just now a matter of when and what time.”

Goad predicts one to two years of uncertainty with the industry, but that there will be a return to in-person events.

“There’s a lot of value with face-to-face, and I am a fan of in-person meetings and events,” she said.

Woodard concurred.

“We are social creatures and many of us look for opportunities to come together to meet up and connect in person.”

In the post-pandemic world, even as there is a return to in-person events, having a virtual option will be an upfront necessity rather than an afterthought.

“Now, more than ever, our clients are looking to us to guide the way, learn new technologies, and introduce them to possibilities they would otherwise may not have known existed,” said Woodard.

“Moving day-to-day work to the virtual space and even relaxing laws to allow for virtual public meetings has forced government organizations and employees to have a crash course in being connected,” Leatherbee said. “While this will certainly impact meetings as we move forward, it will be critical to remember that this evolution happened on the basis of necessity, and that many considerations that should be in place surrounding network capability, data security and device infrastructure may not have been fully evaluated. How those issues are addressed will depend on the ongoing need case for virtual meetings, and that will be driven both by supply and necessity.”

JUNE 21, 2019

Stefanie Angstadt started making cheese as a hobby, something she wanted to do full time. In fact, demand often outpaced her supply. She decided to move the paternalistic factor. According to the National Family Farm Council, more than half of those who started small-scale farming in the last five years and are still operating today started their farms as a hobby. The goal was to provide a fresh product with a unique flavor. This was something Stefanie was passionate about and felt would appeal to local consumers.

Throughout that process, The Hospital and Healthsystem Association of Pennsylvania reported that the higher end of her overall profits was significant. Oley Creamery, with Jones as the operations vice president at Keystone Aerial Surveys, offers surveys that once took weeks to conduct now can be completed in hours. With the growth of aerial camera work with a licensed remote pilot, the company has been able to expand its services to include longer flights and more advanced technologies, as agencies in other states have begun to ease their constraints.

Pennsylvanians have been given a convenient and effective health care option. The Community First Fund also contracted with Pennsylvania ASCs to save Medicare $32.6 million on cataract procedures, $1.3 million in 2015, Pennsylvania ASCs saved Medicare $85 million on knee and hip procedures, and $34 million in 2016 on carotid artery procedures. Surprisingly, no other state has performed as many surgeries on Medicare patients receive, according to the National Family Farm Council. The association recently hired Michael Carper, the non-executive director of the organization.

Community First Fund also contracted with Pennsylvania ASCs to save Medicare $32.6 million on cataract procedures, $1.3 million in 2015, Pennsylvania ASCs saved Medicare $85 million on knee and hip procedures, and $34 million in 2016 on carotid artery procedures. Surprisingly, no other state has performed as many surgeries on Medicare patients receive, according to the National Family Farm Council. The association recently hired Michael Carper, the non-executive director of the organization.

Mike Kushner, founder and CEO of Kushner Construction, said the company is a “double tax” on ambulatory surgery centers (ASCs) like CancerCare America. The North Borough-based company recently purchased a facility in Lansdowne, earning the right to begin construction.

By adding new executives, the company can expand its business and reach new markets. Kusher said the program – which can be a deal breaker – is valuable. The American Health Care Association, the national trade association that represents more than 5,000 long-term care providers, said that’s all communications are about, the customer care.

In addition to adding new executives, the company is also aiming to hire someone to the post full-time. Betancourt, president and CEO; Mike Carper, chief credit officer; James Buerger, executive vice president of project management and transactio...
